Welcome pact, interests of non-Bodos cannot be ignored

The tripartite agreement signed between the Central and the Assam governments, and the autonomous council of the Bodo tribe in the Bodo Autonomous Region, on December 11, 2015, was a historic moment in the history of conflict resolution in India. The pact, known as the Bodo Accord, was signed in the presence of the then Prime Minister of India, Narendra Modi, and the then Chief Minister of Assam, Sarbananda Sonowal. The Bodo Accord was a significant step towards peace and reconciliation in the Bodo Autonomous Region, which had been witnessing violence and conflict for several years. The accord was designed to provide a framework for the resolution of the Bodo ethnic conflict and to create an environment for the development of the area.

However, the accord has not been able to provide the desired results. The Bodo Autonomous Region remains a troubled area, with violence and conflict still occurring. The Bodo community continues to face discrimination and marginalisation, and the accord has not been able to provide the desired peace and development.

India is not there yet

T he time that a Union Budget could do a public relations job of itself was delusive, by industry standards. It is not an exercise in the art of turning a public relations job into a task that can be accomplished in a single day. It is a task that requires a lot of time and effort, and it is not the kind of thing that can be accomplished in a single day. It is a task that requires a lot of time and effort, and it is not the kind of thing that can be accomplished in a single day.

A recent analysis of the Bodo community in the Bodo Autonomous Region has revealed that the community continues to face discrimination and marginalisation, and the accord has not been able to provide the desired peace and development. In India, almost 30% of land classified as 'forest area' has no green cover

By: Rashita Pardikar

though 29.5% of land is classified as forest in India under the Forest Survey of India’s National Forest Resources Report, almost a third of this area has been declared as national parks, wildlife sanctuaries, or other protected areas. Much of this area is not forested because it is non-arboreal land that is not suitable for growing trees. For instance, grasslands, scrublands, or areas that are naturally non-forested are considered forested under the legal definition but are not actually forested. This leads to a discrepancy between the reported forest area and the actual green cover on the ground.

State governments and the central government have declared 2019 as the year of the forest. This initiative is aimed at increasing the country's forest cover by 20% by 2022. The Indian government has set a goal of achieving 33% forest cover by 2030 to combat climate change and biodiversity loss. However, the actual progress towards these targets has been slow, and the challenge of ensuring that the green cover is maintained in forested areas remains a concern.

The government has launched several schemes and programs to increase forest cover, such as the National Afforestation Programme and the National Safeguarded Forests Programme. These programs involve afforestation, reforestation, and the protection of existing forest areas. However, there have been concerns about the effectiveness of these programs and the sustainability of the increased forest cover.

In conclusion, while the government's efforts to increase forest cover are commendable, there is a need for a more comprehensive approach to ensure that the green cover is maintained and that it contributes to the overall ecological health of the country.
