Pak’s dictator democracy

December, when former President Gen Pervez Musharraf was wrapping up his party’s private meeting in a hotel before the crush of the crowd to support the dictatorial. It seemed that Pakistan’s all-powerful army was too busy anyway dealing with its own affairs to notice the fact that Musharraf, who had been in power for nearly a decade, was about to be thrown out of office. The army, which had long controlled the country, was likely to continue doing so in the future, no matter who was in power.

The situation of a nation is measured primarily economically, and in the current economic, a strong military is needed because the economic and political situation has deteriorated so much that it is difficult, and consequently, nations fight and risk war over which group should have the power to protect their land. The “nation of military” is the country and the democratic institutions. One of the main reasons for this is the increasing number of people in the middle class who do not support the dictatorial. The world is in turmoil, and many countries are struggling to survive. The economy of the country is in a state of mess, and the people are struggling to make ends meet.

While the middle class wants the military to protect them, the industry’s expectations from the government are not met. The Gross Domestic Product (GDP) growth rate for the fiscal year 2019-2020, is expected to be lower than in the previous year. The stimulus package announced by the government has not been able to boost the economy. The industrial sector is struggling to survive, and the agricultural sector is not doing well either. The country is facing a severe economic crisis, and the government is struggling to find a solution.

The government has taken several measures to control inflation and boost the economy. The government has increased the prices of essential commodities, and the inflation rate has increased. The government has also increased the tax rates on various goods and services. The government has also introduced a new tax on imports, which has increased the cost of imported goods.

The government has also announced a new package of reforms to boost the economy. The package includes tax cuts, subsidies, and increased spending on infrastructure. However, the package has been criticized for not being focused enough on the needs of the middle class.

The government has also been criticized for not doing enough to control inflation. The inflation rate has been higher than expected, and the government has been criticized for not doing enough to control the prices of basic commodities. Here's why India has one of the highest rates of infant mortality in the world

By: A na Sandoiu

According to the World Health Organization's (WHO) most recent report on the State of the World's Health, India has one of the highest rates of infant mortality in the world. By any measure, the report says, India's performance on child health is unacceptable. In the past 30 years, the under-five mortality rate (U5MR) has only improved slowly from 126 in 1990 to 59%, which is still far from the WHO's goal of achieving U5MR of 25% or lower by 2030.

There are other factors that may offer better chances of survival for babies. However, the WHO's UNFPA said, "The UNFPA report tells us that the consequences of a lifetime-threatening and the longer the newborn and left without the help of the family, the greater the risk.

Sugar alters brain chemistry after only 12 days

Researchers have discovered that sugar can alter brain chemistry after just 12 days of consumption. The study, published in the Journal of Neuroscience, reveals that sugar consumption can change brain chemistry in as little as 12 days, potentially leading to long-term effects on mental health and behavior.

The researchers found that sugar consumption alters the levels of key neurotransmitters in the brain, including dopamine, serotonin, and glutamate. These changes can lead to changes in mood, appetite, and stress levels, and may contribute to the development of addiction and other mental health disorders.

The study also highlights the importance of understanding the role of sugar in the brain, as it could have significant implications for public health and the prevention of obesity and other diet-related diseases.
